Workshop on Basic Values and Principles to Guide the Assessment and Promotion of Social Progress

On February 19, most of the authors responsible for writing the "compass-setting" chapter for the report of the International Panel on Social Progress --that is, its introductory normative chapter-- will be presenting material delineating the basic values and principles that the group believes are most relevant to assessing and promoting the progress of human societies in the plural, and indeed of human society as such. The authors gathering in Princeton for this occasion are:

- Stefano Bartolini (University of Siena, Italy)
- Paula Casal (University of Pompeu Fabra, Spain)
- Matthew Clayton (University of Warwick, UK)
- Rahel Jaeggi (Humboldt University, Germany)
- Niraja Jayal (Jawaharlal Nehru University, India)
- Workineh Kelbassa (Addis Ababa University, Ethiopia)
- Debra Satz (Stanford University, USA)
- Erik Schokkaert (University of Leuven, Belgium)
- Henry Richardson (Georgetown University, USA)

This day-long workshop will allow ample time for discussion, as the authors are eager for feedback from those present both with regard to the underlying philosophical concepts and arguments and with regard to how best to present a considerable amount of fundamental material in a way that, while reflecting critical judgment and philosophical insight, remains broadly accessible to a wide audience and serving as a useful framework for the other panelists writing on concrete social justice issues and on policy and institutional improvements.

For more information:
http://www.ip-socialprogress.org/
https://www.facebook.com/ipsprogress
https://twitter.com/ipsprogress

Detailed schedule will be available soon on the Center’s website
RSVP required-please contact Sue Winters at suewint@princeton.edu